LIVING WITH DEMENTIA

Dementia is not a specific disease, but a collective term used to describe a group of conditions that cause a progressive loss of brain function. There are over 100 diseases that can cause dementia, with the most common three being Alzheimer's disease, Vascular dementia, and Lewy body disease.

While dementia is more common in older adults, it is not a normal part of aging.

Different types of dementia can have different impacts on a person's abilities, but in general, dementia affects thinking, behaviour and the ability to perform everyday tasks. There are a number of services that can support the carer and a person in the earlier stages of dementia to continue to live within their home and stay connected to their community.

Use of assistive technology can aid safety and orientation within the home, can assist the carer, and enable the person with dementia to continue their everyday activities for as long as possible.

Aidacare's range of assistive technology and dementia care products aim to promote safety and support within the home.

For information, education and support on Managing Dementia contact the National Dementia Helpline 1800 100 500.
